“Due to the decrease in excess skin in the upper eyelids, it appears that she had an upper blepharoplasty (eyelid lift),” Dr. McNally speculated. “With this, the tail of her eyebrows is a touch higher, which can be achieved with a brow pexy through that blepharoplasty incision.”

The surgeon does not think she received a brow lift, since her hairline does not look shifted, but it’s possible she had work done lower down on her face.

“Her cheeks look lifted and her nasolabial folds look softened without appearing fuller, so I don’t think it’s filler or fat grafting to the cheeks, which is very common,” Dr. McNally suspected. “I think she had a midface lift, which can be achieved through an incision from inside of the lower eyelid, which, based, on her age and photos, she was a good candidate for.”

Stone's plastic surgery buzz comes approximately a month after she got roasted for comparing her new film Bugonia to the Luigi Mangione case. In the fictional drama, she portrays a healthcare executive who gets abducted by an employee.

"What's really crazy, after we had shot the film – I live in New York – we heard someone was shot up the street. It was a healthcare CEO. You know, because Luigi. You guys heard about this?" she said during a Q&A at the Telluride Film Festival on August 30.

She continued, "It was wild, because we had all just been in a basement [filming] together, talking about these issues and the bigger meaning of everything. It keeps hitting you that the world is so deeply fraught and terrifying in so many ways."
